Hazardous Weather

Hazardous Weather

Showers and isolated storms are still possible this morning across the central and southern Panhandles.

Looking at today's map, which is overlaid on an infrared satellite image from late Tuesday night: An upper-level low pressure system along the Texas Coast will bring another round of isolated to scattered showers and storms to the region Today. Severe weather is not expected, but locally heavy rain and gusty winds may occur in a storm or two. Looking to our east: Tropical Storm Elsa will affect Florida and the Southeast U.S. over the next few days. Official updates on Elsa can be found at nhc.noaa.gov.

Hazardous Weather

Scattered to numerous showers and thunderstorms are expected today especially across the southeast counties. In addition to a cloud to ground lightning threat, locally heavy downpours leading to flash flooding. A Flash Flood Watch is in effect for Karnes, Dewitt and Lavaca Counties through the period. The coverage of showers and storms is forecast to decrease around sunset.

Flash Flood Watch is in effect for Karnes, Dewitt and Lavaca Counties through Friday morning. Expect 1 to 3 inches of rainfall over these locations with isolated pockets of 4 to 6 inches possible. Turn around don't drown.

Hazardous Weather

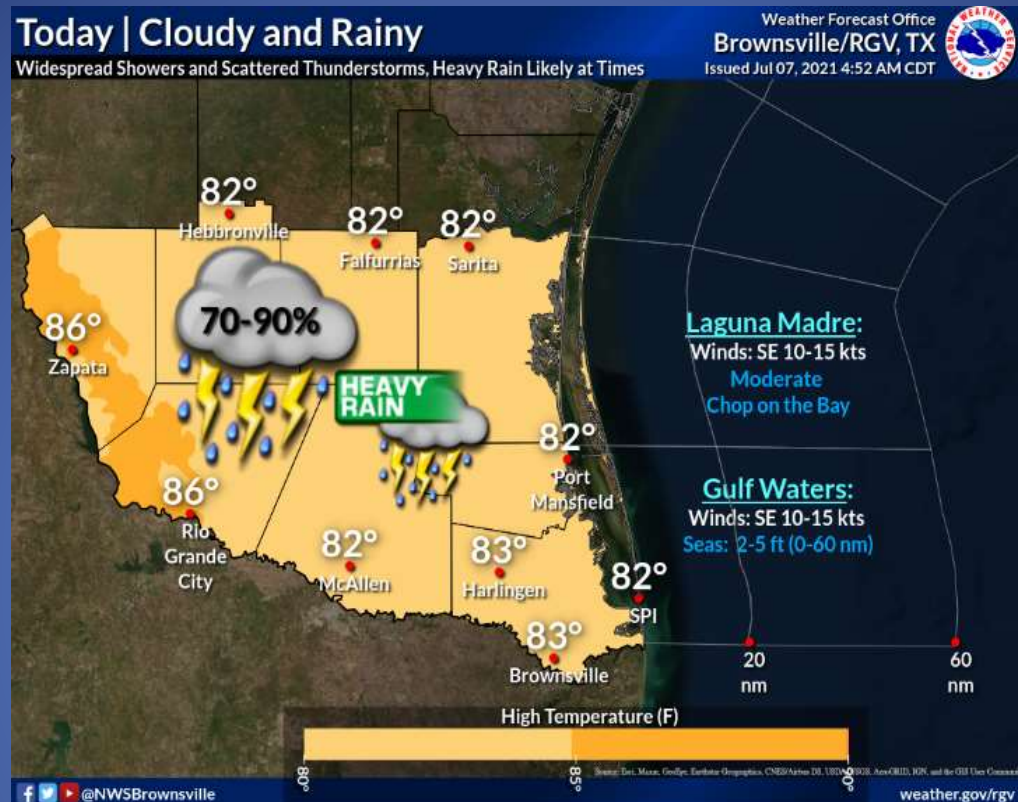

Numerous showers and scattered thunderstorms are expected today through Thursday night. Additional rainfall amounts will average from 4 to 6 inches inland Coastal Bend and 8 to 12 inches along the coast with isolated higher amounts possible. As a result, a Flash Flood Watch is now in effect through early Friday morning.

A Flash Flood Watch remains in effect for Deep South Texas through Thursday afternoon. Additional heavy rainfall is likely with total rainfall amounts through Thursday afternoon could total 4 to 8 inches with locally higher amounts. Remember, most flood related deaths occur in vehicles, so turn around, don't drown!

Hazardous Weather

Cloudy with widespread showers and scattered thunderstorms today. Heavy rainfall is likely at times. A Flash Flood Watch is in effect for today. Mariners can expect light to moderate southeast winds and moderate seas.
